Fatima Alshopy is a social worker. And this is the number one refugee camp in Nablus, in the occupied Palestinian territory.

Fatima's visiting Maha Qatouny, a 32-year-old mother of three who recently suffered a terrible injury.

SOT Maha Qatouny

Mother

"A bullet came through the window, entered my back and went out through my abdomen. I was seven months pregnant."

UNICEF works with local partners in Nablus, and the wider West Bank to provide psychological support to Palestinians so that they can deal with the effects of constant violence.

The project backed by ECHO, the European Commission Humanitarian aid department, helps to train counsellors.

SOT Mustafa Oumar

Director, YMCA Nablus

"In order to enable le to carry out psychological and social interventions and to work with victims of trauma, they must be professionally qualified, trained and provided with the skills to carry out emergency, psychological and social interventions. We have succeeded in creating a qualified team, which is able to intervene in emergency and crisis situations."

The programme includes also provides spaces for children to play and study in safety.

These children at the Beitfourik village, in East Nablus, have a place to come twice a week where they can play and study in safety.

"In general the psycho social projects work that ECHO is funding in the Palestinian territory work at three levels. First of all and primary with children directly, to provide them with opportunities to play, with psycho social support. We are working then with caretakers, in schools, families, to give them the tools to understand the way that children react to the crisis, to the violence.
