Script

An evacuation drill for the children of Banadero elementary school.

Orderly columns of youngsters, moving out to designated assembly points – an essential exercise when living in the shadow of the Mayon volcano.

SOUNDBITE Paulina Vibal, School Principal: “Due to these drills given to us, we are not anymore afraid because we already know what to do in times of calamities,”

A reassurance for children like Joshua Loria. Now 11, he’s already experienced two evacuations in his lifetime.

SOUNDBITE: Joshua Loria “There were lots of people everywhere and we felt worried. We did not know whether our home would still be there when we got back.”
Living a few minutes walk from the school, thankfully his home has escaped damage. But everyone knows the risks of living in one of the most disaster prone areas of the Philippines.

A volcano on one side – on the other, the Pacific Ocean which spawns devastating typhoons.

Ruined buildings attest to the destructive forces of nature down the years – most recently 2006 when a typhoon brought tones of volcanic debris, crashing down the mountainside.

Across the country, hundreds of schools were destroyed and damaged, effecting half a million children, and UNICEF has been supporting efforts to restore the education system.

New day care centres have been built.

And new school buildings have been constructed to withstand typhoon-force
